

Thrilling Adventures:

[From the Denver News]

A Correspondent of the Chicago Post, with the commercial party from that city, sends home amusing accounts of their adventures on the U. P. road. The party practised gymnastics at one station, and Senator Trumbull turned a summersault off a precipice, and was saved from destruction by his unmentionables catching on a sharp limb and holding him suspended over the chasm. He was hauled up safe with a rope. How the party shot a bear is thus told:

Taking advantage of a halt which the Colonel had ordered to secure the milk of a mountain goat which he espied out of the car window, Mr. Grant seized the occasion to stray from the excursion, and coming upon a beautiful stream hard by, prepared himself for a swim. After indulging to his satisfaction, he came leisurely ashore, when what was his horror, on approaching the place where he had left his clothes, to discover in the dim twilight a huge grizzly bear just ready to seize him in his tight embrace. O. G. waited not for ceremony. He thought not of clothes, but clad simply in the glorious mountain dew which is one of the charming concomitants of night in these regions, he left incontinently for the car. Panting with exhaustion, with lacerated feet, eyes protruding from their sockets, and hair on end, O. G. burst in upon his startled companions, crying "Bear! Bear!" Mr. J. M., supposing O. G. to be speaking phonetically, and to be shouting "Bare!" cried out, amid shouts of laughter from the curious Wide-Awakes: "Well, what in thunder are you bare for?" "A grizzly bear! A grizzly bear!" returned O. G. with hot anger. Then did consternation take the place of ridicule. The excursionists armed themselves in hot haste. Every man took a revolver, a rifle, or a bottle—the cooks seized some article of stove gear, and thus equipped—two of the company, making a chair of their hands, and tenderly bearing the nude O. G. along as guide—slowly and cautiously approached the spot; and, sure enough no sooner had they arrived on their tiptoe at the place, than the bear burst full upon the startled party. But not a lip quivered, nor a cheek blanched. Revolvers were levelled, rifles came to a poise, skittles were lifted in the air, and at the word of command given by the fearless Colonel, a volley was discharged. With a groan of mingled rage and pain the mountain monster fell, stone dead. A rush to the spot ensued. All eyes were fastened upon the lifeless form before them. Then followed a look into each other's eyes, and then a snort—and then—"a jackass!" shouted one and all. It was an animal who had escaped from the corral of the company, and had luckily come upon the domain of the swimming O. G. Casting a look upon that chagrined individual, more in sorrow than in anger, the disappointed Wide-Awakes left their bear meat behind them, and the sheepish O. G. covered his bare form, sought his downy couch in the car, and was seen no more during the night.

Dr Palmer and party got back here Wednesday evening last, from Bill Williams' Mountain. E. J. Cook, one of the Prescott party that accompanied the expedition, informs us that a toad was found on the top of the mountain, which when made mad, spouted blood from its eyes. It was secured by the doctor.—Miner.
